

9 down, 2 to go

Nine wins. Wow. Sit back, and just think about that for a second. Truly amazing, isn't it? Last year, this week, we were all still jumping up and down, hearts beating faster than ever, because our Dolphins finally got a win. A, as in one, win. Now, we are doing the same, except for a different reason. Not because we know that we won't go winless, and that we've avoided complete embarrassment, but because we're one win away from playing in the biggest game this franchise has had in quite a long time. A win against the Chiefs will, regardless of what anybody else does, secure a playoff game against New York on the 28th.

If we can muster up a victory against a putrid Kansas City Chief team this Sunday, (and I would hope that we could), we will be going into New York in Week 17, for a game that decides it all. Win, and we host a playoff game, and go into January the number 3 seed. Lose, and we watch from home...again.

I really believe that if we play Miami Dolphins football, the way that we have been playing it for most of this second half of the season, (definitely not what we saw last Sunday), then the next 2 weeks will be a breeze. We will go into KC and pummel the Chiefs, and do the same to a VERY inconsistent Jets' team. NY has been playing flat out terrible the past few weeks, getting embarrassed by Denver at home, and then losing to San Fran out west. They did not beat the Bills...JP Losman and Dick Jouron beat the Buffalo Bills...but that's for another topic of discussion.

To put it all into a couple of statements: We have two games left, two games that we should win. If we do, then we are in. If we don't, we're not. Let's go out, and win these next 2 games, and go back to Miami...not because the off-season has come early, but because we're playing in the season of the elite.

We're a better team than NY, and most certainly a superior team to the one that currently resides in KC. Let's go out and prove it, and earn the right to host another game this season; a Playoff game.
